Medical English looks very different from the English that most people are familiar with: Texts and conversations are full of complicated technical terms, the grammar is unusual, and sentences can be as long as paragraphs. However, medical English may be simpler than you think. In this talk the audience will learn how to break complicated medical terms into their component parts. They will also learn about the surprisingly simple logic behind the structure of medical research papers. A third strand in the talk will look at the flow and structure of a doctor-patient interview. It is hoped that the audience will leave with a new perspective, no longer feeling confused or intimidated by the world of medical English.
